

Syllable-final nasals in Japanese

The hiragana symbol <ん> is used to spell a nasal sound that appears in syllable-final position (more about syllables coming soon). However, from the perspective of phonetics, there are many different pronunciations associated with this spelling.

(Data from Vance 2008)

- How should we phonetically transcribe the sound spelled by <ん> in each case?
- Are these different surface realizations of <ん> in predictable (complementary) distribution? If so, how can we describe the relevant environments?
- (Advanced question): How should we label this phoneme? Is /n/ a good choice? Why or why not?
